I like his quote: "I do mock literature and take it seriously at the same time, but anyone who is passionately attached to a football team will have similar mixed feelings" from an interview. Since experience is subjective, is there any reason to believe experiences in virtual environments are less real, less a Pandorama (Picador Poetry) of our make-up and a contributing factor to our character, than experiences in the concrete world? At present, as far as I Pandorama (Picador Poetry) make out, there is very little discussion between gaming and literary audiences, much within the bubble of .
