The average tenure of a seat of the Members returned at the general election of was 22 years 7 months, and of Members returned at by-elections between and 15 years 3 months. Deism, so fashionable in French intellectual circles during the eighteenth century, was not taken up on any large scale in England; and while there were undoubtedly men in the House who would be described today as agnostics Gibbon and Wilkes are obvious examples a decent respect for the outward forms of religion was expected from Members and freely accorded.

There were a few men in this period who began a selection manager on behalf of the winter session and its politics, see Peter D.
